End

It was a dark and stormy night, and Perry Gunnite was working late at the office; he was catching up on his crossword puzzles.

"What's a four letter word meaning precipitation?" he asked himself as he gazed out the rain-soaked window. A rumble of thunder aroused him from his musings.

"This is just the kind of a night when a beautiful girl in distress should come to my office!" he said hopefully.

Just then the office door burst open, and a beautiful girl entered, accompanied by a gust of wind and rain. She was rain-soaked and tearful.

"Close the door!" yelled Perry. "We'll drown if you don't!"

"S-sorry!" the girl sobbed, closing the door. "Oh, sir, you've got to help me!"

"You want some shrewd private-eye work done, I presume!" said Perry briskly.

"Well, not exactly," sobbed the girl. "My car broke down outside your office, and I've got to get out of town—fast!"

"If you have a dime, I'll be glad to call a taxi!" Perry gallantly offered.

"Oh, no!" she said hastily. "I must use my own car!"

"In that case, I'll have a look at your car and see if I can locate the trouble," Perry said, getting to his feet.

They went outside into the storm and had a look at the car.

"You're not going anywhere in 'that car,'" he remarked, "not with four flat tires!"

"Oh no!" sobbed the girl. "I just have to get . . ." then her tone changed, as she saw a car at the curb near Perry's office. "Do you know whose car that is?" she asked.

"My car, ma'am!" replied Perry. "But I'm afraid you can't use it! It's kind of a, well, a one-man car! Very temperamental!"

Just then the wail of a siren sounded through the roar of the storm. The girl's attitude changed abruptly. She whipped out a small hand gun and snapped, "In that case YOU drive!"

Perry was never one to argue with a lady and especially a lady with a gun, so he got into the car. The girl climbed in beside him, holding the gun in his ribs. Perry started the car, and took off, as the siren grew louder and louder.

"Can't you make this thing go faster?" the girl yelled.

"I - I don't think so," faltered Perry. Then, aware of the gun in his ribs, he added hastily, "Yes, I think so!"

He pressed the accelerator, and the car sped through the storm. The wind and rain lashed at them, and soon Perry was soaked to the skin. However, the sound of the siren diminished.

"Nice going!" cried the girl. "I think we are losing them!"

"You know something, ma'am?" said Perry. "I think you're some kind of a crook, if you'll pardon me!"

"You're right! I'm Sobbin' Sal, girl jewel thief! Now step on it!" she said.

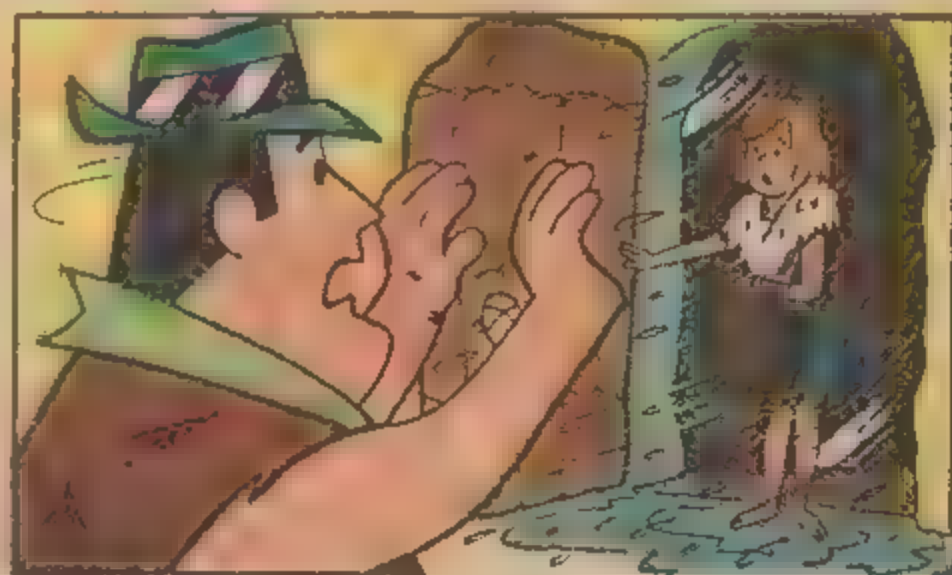

Just then things began to happen. Two of the wheels flew off the car, then another, and another; and the car skidded to a halt in the middle of a big puddle.

"I told you this car was temperamental, ma'am," said Perry, as they sat in water up to their necks.

In no time, Sobbin' Sal was taken into custody, and Perry returned to his office.

Rain-soaked and weary, he sank into his office chair and sighed. Then he saw the crossword puzzle on his desk.

"Say!" he brightened. "Now I know what that four letter word is that means precipitation! It's R-A-I-N!"
